The public ceremonial over, the Victoria Bridge was not yet opened, --descending from the platform, the Prince of Wales, his suite, and the gentlemen connected with the bridge, entered the railway car and were borne to the centre of the tunnel, where four rivets (one a silver one, reserved for the Royal hand,) were alone wanting to complete the structure. The hammers of the bronze workmen soon resounded through the vault like dim illumined space, and brought their task to an end. When the Prince s turn came, he seized the hammer wrong end up, and laughed heartily when told of the mistake, a few vigorous blows from the Royal hammer fastened in the rivet, and brought to a successful close the labours of fifteen years. An Address was then read in the tunnel by the Directors, giving a long eloquent history of the bridge. Mr. Blackwell presented His Royal Highness with a gold medal in commemoration of the event, handsome silver ones were given to the suite. As a work of Art the medal is extremely beautiful, and contains besides the inscription and date, on one side the representation of a train of cars emerging from the bridge, while in the foreground is seen a steamer ascending, and a raft descending the river. On the reverse of the medal are the busts of the Queen, Prince Albert, and the Prince of Wales, surmounted by the Royal Arms. In the...
