Excerpt: . sador to Henry VIII., was to have set out for England on the following morning, with a colleague named Piero Pasqualigo; and when the Senate assembled on the 27th December for the purpose of replacing him, the election fell on Sebastian Giustinian. He requested time to consider until the morrow, and then accepted the post, demanding, however, an increase of salary, as he understood it would behove him to evince greater hospitality, and to make more display, in England than elsewhere, He also expressed a wish, ere departing, to finish the trial of the ex-Count of Sebenico, whom he had accused of improper intimacy with a nun and another lady of Illyria, and also of having murdered a barber. How he disposed of this strange delinquent is not said. The instructions under which Sebastian Giustinian acted in his English embassy, will be found in the Commission inserted hereafter, and his Despatches from the English Court form the principal contents of this work. It is sufficient to add, that he reached Venice on his return from England, October 6th, 1519, and after shaking, or rather touching hands--as was the original custom in Italy--with Doge Loredano, took his seat in the College as Councillor Superior, to which rank he had been elevated during his absence. On the 10th of October he made his report of England to the Senate, and although the honour of our country is not materially affected by the corpulence of the...
