Tubercular Perihepatitis. Shews the thick hyaline and caseous membrane produced in the chronic hyperplastic type. condition is that caseation is superadded to the hyaline degeneration so that the membrane does not altogether present the pearly white appearance of the icing condition but is rather more opaque and yellowish. Again, while in true zuckerguss condition the exudation is enormous and the adhesions are trifling, in the tubercular form adhesion is more extensive and exudation is relatively slight. In fact the peritoneal cavity may be completely obliterated so that ascites may be absent or at most there may be a few small pockets of exudation between the coils of the intestine. The membrane produced is never smooth and glistening but always covered with fibrin and shaggy adhesions. The liver and spleen are generally large. Tubercular lesions of the various viscera are common, such as tuberculosis of the lungs, peribronchial and mesenteric glands, and a miliary tuberculosis may end the scene. Clinically the symptom-complex of Curschmann is lacking; cases run a much more rapid course, the abdominal pain and digestive disturbances are more marked and the temperature is irregularly elevated. So far, however, as the character of the inflammatory process is concerned we see that it differs in no essential particular from that in the true icing condition except in the caseation, the specific lesion of a tuberculous affection. Hyaline degeneration with connective tissue hyperplasia are characteristic of both forms....
