They are often made out of pieces of sheet iron with bent or flanged edges, or sometimes with a curled edge. The idea in making the curl is to strengthen, or stiffen, it and to make it carry over a longer span. The one I generally use is simply corrugated, one that can be turned out by any manufactory of corrugated iron. It is cheap and stiff. In the matter of lighting, the paragraph which is given to that, is simply a practical statement. I do not know that there is any scientific way of getting at any particular amount of light for a building. Of course, years ago buildings were constructed very badly in this respect, and had comparatively little natural light so that on dark days, or early in the afternoon of short winter days, there...
