Excerpt: . . . having given her fiat, made her exit, cooking up some observation as she did so, in which the opprobrious epithet person spluttered with a steaklike hiss. And again Mr. Chickenhackle would have impressed the spectator with the idea of fleas. CHAPTER V. A DOMESTIC DIFFERENCE. Why, my dear! cried Mrs. Chickenhackle, as her spouse entered her room; how rough your hair is! Whatever have you been doing to it you look quite wild. And enough to make me. Heres Elizabeth Meagrim comes one minute, and says that if her godchild isnt christened with her name first, she shant have her legacy; and then, the next minute, comes Mary Ricketts, and says that if the child isnt christened with her name first, she shant have her legacy! And how can it be done We cant make the two names march side by side, like school-girls out for a walk. Ill declare theres more fuss about it than it is worth. What it! rejoined Mrs. Chickenhackle. Surely by it you do not refer to your child, Mr. C. Bless me, Maria, no I answered the Mr. C, somewhat testily. No, poor little thing! and certainly it seems but right--quite a parental duty, I may say--that we should endeavour, if possible, to secure both legacies for her; not so much for the sake of the money itself, but that it will place her above the frowns of the world, if anything should happen to us, and if...
