All the lessons were given twice a week, and lasted for three-quarters of an hour. This is the regular German plan. Each lesson is followed by a quarter of an hour in the playground. The difference between the Burgers schools, middle schools, girls high schools, boys real schools and gymnasia did not trouble me, because without exception these schools take children from six years upwards. The difference is partly social; the Burgers schools are free, for other schools a fee is paid. And of course the studies are carried further in the higher schools where there are scholars, both boys and girls, of twenty years. As far as singing goes the conditions are the same. The only thing is that, as in England, the poorer children sing the best. All the singing lessons I heard at Frankfort were given by the ordinary teaching staff of the school, though to some extent specially musical teachers are set apart for the Subject. I found no trace of a music supervisor or inspector. There are evening schools in the winter, but they have no singing. As the school year ends at Easter, and I was in Frankfort a fortnight after, my visit was badly timed. I did not hear the classes at their best. I was curious that the local authority to whom I wrote a month before did not tell me of this. A SAMPLE MUSIC LESSON. (Notice that...
